“ Remembering You, Mama

Today marks eight years since you left us, and my heart feels the weight of your absence all over again. The memories of you flood my mind, some bringing tears and others making me smile and laugh out loud. One memory, in particular, stands out today—one that perfectly captures your love for fun and family.

I remember when we were living out in the country, and Tom, Chele, and Justin came to visit. Out of nowhere, a freak snowstorm hit, and we found ourselves snowed in. Instead of letting the weather get us down, we decided to make the best of it, just like you always did. We gathered up the old pool frame, cut it into pieces, drilled holes, and added ropes to make sleds. We spent hours racing down the hill toward the pond, laughing until our sides hurt—especially when the “sleds” froze and started breaking in half. Each of us went careening in different directions, completely out of control, but it didn’t matter. It was pure joy.

When we couldn’t feel our fingers anymore and all the “sleds” were broken, we came inside to warm up. That’s when you suggested making snow cream. Oh, Mama, we made so much snow cream that day! We used up all the vanilla, then started experimenting with every other flavor we could find. Eventually, we got into your soda maker syrups and kept eating until we were all absolutely miserable.

It’s memories like this that remind me of how much love and laughter you brought into our lives. You always knew how to turn the simplest moments into unforgettable adventures.

I miss you every day, Mama, but especially today. Thank you for the memories that still bring warmth to my heart. I hope you know how much you’re loved and missed. ❤️
